Log view: microprint chunks

The diagram shows the structure of a log view. It consists of a sequence of chunks, each represented by a small box. The duration time for a log chunk is constant, and the duration time for the sequence of chunks is also constant. The text below explains the concept of microprint chunks:

The number of chunks results from partitioning the step log into consecutive groups of lines, where the group size is adaptively determined by the total length (i.e., number of lines) of the log.
